Filmic magic realism full of nostalgia

Beatrice

JORIS MERTENS

1972. In a metropolis reminiscent of both Paris and Brussels, young Beatrice commutes daily to the Galeries La Brouette, where she sells gloves. When she finds a photo album in a discarded bag, she swoons at the images of a young couple in the roaring twenties. She goes in search of the locations where the photos were taken, but discovers that most of the buildings have been torn down. Until she comes across one of the cafés in the photos. Time appears to have stood still here, and she suddenly finds herself in the 1920s. She meets the man from the album and lives the young woman's life. But all magic comes to an end.

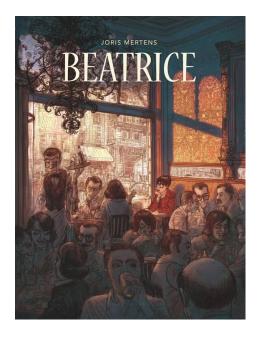

A triumph of atmosphere and style

KNACK

With his wordless debut 'Beatrice', Joris Mertens pulls out all the stops. By playing with alternating perspectives, he never fails to draw the reader's gaze to the right place. Detailed drawings dominated by shades of red and brown do an excellent job of conveying the bustling city in contrast with Beatrice's loneliness. Drenched in nostalgia and melancholy, 'Beatrice' is a story full of enchantment and atmosphere.

Dazzling, both graphically and emotionally. Unprecedented. 'Béatrice' is a surprising, virtuoso and poetic piece of work

LE FIGARO

AUTHOR

Joris Mertens (b. 1968) has spent 25 years working as a set designer, art director, illustrator, storyboard artist, photographer and graphic designer. That work has given him a great deal of experience of telling stories through atmosphere, imagery and storyboarding, true to the idea of 'show, don't tell'. It was therefore only a matter of time before he started making graphic novels, in which the drawings are the real medium. Photo © Joris Mertens
