

The poetry of small things

I Have Travelled Far, But Won't Stay Long

WARD ZWART & ENZO SMITS

Gus is in his thirties when he returns to the village where he grew up. His band, successful on the indie circuit, once gave him a way out of the sleepy community, but now his band have split up and his relationship is on the rocks. Cas and his friends are in their final year in school, balancing on the cusp of adulthood. Their days are filled with skateboarding, making music and just hanging around and they can't wait to get away.

A poetic and intoxicating mood to cherish

BRUZZ

Ward Zwart and Enzo Smits evoke the atmosphere of nineties skate culture like no other. And yet they do so much more in this beautiful portrait of seeking souls. At no point does the absence of a detailed plot feel like a flaw. We watch through the eyes of Gus and Cas as summer turns to autumn turns to winter. Zwart shows himself a master of low-key yet telling images and detailed facial expressions, rendered fully in pencil. What better way to put it than in the words of BRUZZ magazine: It's the poetry of small things that, more than anything, speaks loud and clear in the work of Zwart and Smits.

An atmospheric, melancholic graphic novel about growing up in the nineties *****

AUTHORS

Ward Zwart (1985-2020) was a successful illustrator for newspapers and magazines at home and abroad for quite some time, but always on the small press circuit. He was a master of creating a melancholic atmosphere, which is both dark and funny at the same time. Zwart infused his work with plenty of humour and saw the beauty in small things. Photo © Ward Zwart Enzo Smits (b. 1988) is a director and script writer. He is deeply rooted in skate culture and draws inspiration from hanging around and doing nothing: 'when you start from nothing, there's a lot of potential.' At first sight, his dialogues seem to be about nothing, yet he manages to create a story out of a series of non-moments.
