

A life disrupted by feelings of guilt

His Name Is David

JAN VANTOORTELBOOM

Flanders, 1914. David, a young Belgian schoolteacher, stands before the firing squad, sentenced to death for desertion. Days earlier, he was teaching his fellow soldiers in the trenches to read and write, dreaming of a forbidden love back in Elverdinge, the Flemish village where he had worked as a teacher - and where, despite family tragedy, squalid surroundings, the rigid mindsets of the villagers and the malign influence of the Catholic Church, David had tried to create something beautiful. But when he befriended a sensitive young pupil, Marcus Verschoppen, disaster followed.

A book to be unashamedly excited about

NRC HANDELSBLAD

In 'His Name Is David' we follow David through two episodes of his life: as a boy of ten and in his early twenties in the First World War. But this is more than a war novel. It is an intimate portrait of a passionate teacher who wishes to inspire those around him to pursue their dreams and not simply resign themselves to the future that is most obvious. At the same time, David himself didn't have an uneventful past: vice and violence cling to his name every bit as much as goodness and dedication. In 'His Name Is David', Jan Vantoortelboom shows how feelings of guilt can disrupt a life.

Like a late summer's day: initially lovely and light, but with a blood-red, deeply melancholy sunset at the end

HUMO

Vantoortelboom strikes a powerfully emotive chord

AUTHOR

Jan Vantoortelboom (b. 1975) grew up in Flanders, but now lives and works in the Netherlands. In many of his novels he revisits the region where he grew up and paints a compelling picture of la Flandre profonde. In each of his books he operates within a frightening universe all his own, a world of psychologically broken men and the damage they do. To many of his characters, life is a question of survival, or of death. They are ruled by fate and have to make the best of a bad situation. His work is characterised by the rich imagination that flows through his intuitive writing.
